The Austrian Monarchy.

The Society of Friends of Austria to the British expresses with singular force the difficulties which have now for nearly two centuries "endured" the Imperial House. The Throne now filled by Francis Joseph was the first Prince of this civilised world. Besides being Archduke of Austria and King of Hungary and Bohemia, he was Governor of Dalmatia, and according to the usages of that state "The Emperor"; for, theoretically, there could be only one Emperor—invested with precedence, if not authority, over all other Monarchs. The Empire, however, was divided into the states of France, Bavaria, leaving the side alone surviving, and within the last twelve months the connection of the Austrian Empire with the German body has been dissolved.

But the loss of so many ancient dignities has not been the worst misfortune of the Imperial family. They will be possessed no more.

Kingdoms, Duchies, and Counties, anciently held in fee simple, have been happily there was no cohesion between them, and no stability in the general fabric.

This defect is all the more remarkable from the fact that it could well be more heterogeneous or composite than the Austrian Monarchy; but it has existed for centuries.
